The response of the cell body and the growth cone of retinal ganglion cells (RGC) to cholinergic stimulation was investigated using whole-cell patch clamp and intracellular calcium ([Ca2+]i) measurements in explants of retinal cell cultures. Cholinergic stimulation evoked either an excitatory or an inhibitory action on the activity of the whole-cell patch clamp recorded cells. The application of an excitatory cholinergic stimulus to the cultured cell bodies of RGC enhanced the spontaneous firing rate of the cholinergic neurones from the cultured retinas. The cholinergic excitatory stimulus failed to evoke any response of the growth cone of RGC. Bicuculline, a GABA(A) antagonist, blocked the excitatory actions of the cholinergic stimulus while strychnine, a glycine antagonist, blocked the inhibitory actions of the cholinergic stimulus. Thalamic reticular nucleus (TRN) or superior colliculus (SC) stimulation enhanced the firing activity of cholinergic neurones. The cholinergic stimulation evoked an excitatory action on the growth cone of RGC in the TRN-recipient explants but an inhibitory action on the growth cone of RGC in the SC-recipient explants.
