A qualitative study of parent responses to toddler/preschooler sibling aggression. We are currently engaged in a study to examine parent attributions to toddler/preschooler aggression. In this study, we sought to understand the responses of parents to parental frustration with their aggressive toddler/preschooler to explore their changing role in modeling the prosocial skills necessary for toddlers/preschoolers to become future social and family members. We conducted in-depth, semistructured interviews with 15 mothers of aggressive children aged 18 to 36 months. Our sample was selected to match the parental demographic information of another larger study of family stressors. When mothers were asked what they perceived as the causes of their child's aggression, their responses fell into five categories: environmental, social, interpersonal, temperamental, and "poor parenting." The post hoc analyses indicated that while the majority of mothers saw the influence of environmental factors in the children's aggression, mothers identified interpersonal factors as the strongest influence in their child's aggression. Data also indicated that most mothers experienced frustration with their child's aggression. This study highlights the importance of understanding parental attributions to the onset and development of aggression in the early stages of human development. This study presents a methodology that can be used in future, larger studies of family stressors as a framework to understand and explain the parental responses to child aggression. --- title: "How to: Register an Event Handled by the AutomationService Provider" ms.date: "11/19/2018" dev_langs: [ "C#" ] helpviewer_keywords: [ "event handling and subscribers, automation service provider", "event handling, automation service provider", "subscribers, automation service provider",

A: Sid Meier's Colonization was released two years before Sid Meier's Alpha Centauri, and while its AI behavior is too simplistic to be anything remotely like the complex human simulated AI in the later game, it does include a much more practical resource management model. You get to build up the planet as you please, assuming there are empty spots available, and use natural resources from the planet to help you build buildings and cities. There is resource and tech management, and an RTS-like gameplay feel to the map construction. I'm pretty sure the AI will do the best it can when it comes to your resources. The Diplomacy expansion provides a sandbox to play with different planets, resources, and AI personalities. I'm sure you can get away with not playing the AI in Alpha Centauri, but you may end up missing out on the most interesting parts of the game.

Q: How to create custom table in Devise registration controller in rails I am working in a project, in which there is a requirement of creating a user through multiple step. Currently I am using Devise for authentication. I want to create a table in my registration controller, which stores the result of the step 1,2,3. The table should contain USER table, which shows the basic information like username, email etc. DOLLAR table, which shows only the value of the last step. It should only contain the value of the step and finally the DETAILS table where I am gonna store the result of step 3. So, when the user comes in step 1, the table USER should be populated, for step 2 I want to populate the table WITH value in table USER only. For step 3 I want to show the result from step 2 and also I want to store the result into table details. What is the best way to do this. A: To do this you need to use `after_sign_up_path_for` callbacks in your registration controller. You need to specify what a user is signing up for in each step. For example, you might have: # Step 1

`after_sign_up_path_for :resource =>'step2'` # Step 2
`after_sign_up_path_for :resource =>'step3'` If you are able to share more of the context, I'll fill
